Are employees exiting because they're not moving along fast enough?
Is the generation gap hindering production in your workplace?
Do your supervisors hold employees accountable?
Are your supervisors motivating employees?

This seminar presented by Personnel Development Strategies and sponsored by MCTC Division of Continuing & Corporate Education, holds the answers to these questions and more. Supervisors will return to work with a tangible list of items that they have put together and can implement to create a more productive workplace. Participants will also earn Continuing Education Units or CEU's for this course.

Seminar Outcomes and Objectives

- Give participants a way to assess many key characteristics of each employee they supervise that does not constitute a performance review
- Discuss work attitudes of employees from each generation
- Present workplace strategies for managing employees from different generations
- Learn how to build individual careers for the employees you supervise
- Present specific thoughts about accountability and detail the three major components for making employees accountable at work
- Hold a group discussion to define what is "fun in the workplace?"
 - List potential activities that might be planned to enhance fun at work
 - Present models for improving three key management processes-problem solving, decision making and planning
- Give participants a proven model for supervisors to use when they need to implement change at work
- Ask each participant to present at least three new ideals they are going to try to implement within their department going forward
- Concluding remarks include a discussion as to what is a "miserable job"
